LEE UFAN

LEE UFAN

"For me, artwork should make the viewers sense a higher, more distant, and larger world than they can see. It should open up a space and initiate viewers to experience a bigger world beyond their sight."

'Against Artifice'

Lee Ufan is known as one of the leading figures of the Mono-ha Movement in Japanese art. What is Mono-ha? Lee explains the background of the movement: "In the late 1960s, the so-called Kinetic Art landed in Japan. It was a kind of trick causing an optical illusion — a confusion of the existence and non-existence of things, confusion of right and wrong. That gave me the idea that 'I see things before me but I can't believe them.' This unique way of critiquing reality, confusing the truth of reality, made a strong impact on me. The year 1968 was very important worldwide. In Italy, Arte Povera came on, an avant-garde art movement that uses materials from daily life and expands the perspective of an artwork by involving its display and site into the work. In such a context, Mono-ha (literally meaning "Object School") claimed to advocate a critique of commercial products and to be 'against artifice.'

What does "against artifice" mean? Lee noted that art, since the beginning of modern times, has been mostly "reproduced." He means that the artists first visualize an original in their minds and then use this to create a visible form. Mono-ha starts off by questioning such a practice. "For Mono-ha artists, a motif remains merely an opportunity for creating a work. More important is that the object to be created, the time, and the site are all interactively reflected in the final work," he said. In other words, "we try to limit our thinking to half of the artwork and to connect the visible with the invisible, the exterior with the interior, in the remaining half."

Installation Works

In this sense, the subject throughout his works, which are created with dots, lines, or a stone skillfully arranged with a steel plate, is the "blank space." Lee explains in his book "Art of Blank Space": "With my artwork, I try to limit what I create and accept what I did not create, through which the parts infiltrate each other in a dynamic relationship. I intend through this dynamic relationship for a poetic, critical and transcendent space to open up. I call it 'art of blank space.' It is not, however, an empty space that lacks reality. For example, when a big drum is struck the sound echoes through the surrounding space. I would call the vibrating space, including the drum, a 'blank space.'"

This art of relationships is what Alexandra Munroe hopes will give American audiences a jolt. "Let's take a look at his installation work 'Relatum — dialogue b' (2009). Steel means industry and symbolizes city and building. By contrast, stone is from nature. Lee Ufan focuses on the relationship between the two components. He shows the dialogue between them. It is very conceptual and dynamic. It will hit the egos of many American viewers hard. They will feel something intrude from outside. It is the purpose of the exhibition to make the viewers receive more than merely a view of the artworks themselves."

'My Art Had to be Different

Why did he want to deal with the invisible? Born in Haman, South Gyeongsang Province, Korea in 1936, Lee was taught writing and drawing by a scholar of Chinese classics during his childhood. His teacher praised his drawings but dissuaded him from continuing to draw. He would state: "Drawing pictures is not a proper occupation for a man. A man should become a scholar or a politician." The young child became confused and came to think that drawing pictures and imitating things as they are was a lowly activity and devoid of status (but he considered music great art because it was invisible).

In 1956, he entered the College of Fine Arts at Seoul National University, but in the summer of the same year, he left for Japan. His father had ordered him to deliver traditional Korean medicines to an uncle living in Japan. His uncle, however, wanted him to stay in Japan. Taking advantage of this opportunity, Lee decided to study something new because he had not been all that excited about studying art in Seoul. He wanted to study literature but needed to first study philosophy to acquire a foundation. For this, he transferred to the Department of Philosophy at Nihon University in Tokyo. It was not easy to study literature in a foreign language that he had yet to master.

"I was also interested in politics and looked into that briefly, but eventually gave it up. It didn't fit my temperament to oppose things just for opposition's sake. And then, after being befriended by artists, I imitated them and created some works of art. But my art had to be different. It was not enough to imitate things as they are. For me, artwork should make the viewers sense a higher, more distant, and larger world than they can see. It should open up a space and initiate viewers to experience a bigger world beyond their sight. Of course, this was all thought out later.

Global Nomad

Lee Ufan is an exemplar among contemporary Korean artists. His artworks commanded the highest prices among works by Koreans at international art auctions in 2009. According to the 2009 annual report of Artprice (www.artprice.com), an online site that assesses international art markets, the total paid for his works in that year amounted to $4,160,000, ranking him 164th for all artists in recent history. He ranks 30th among living artists, and 13th among living Asian artists. His works have been sold at 65 auction events, fetching the highest price of $696,600 for a single piece.

Lee taught at Tama Art University in Tokyo from 1973 to 2007, and was also a visiting professor at École des Beaux-Arts in Paris. He has also been awarded various honors. The Lee Ufan Art Museum in Naoshima, built by the architect Ando Tadao and opened in 2010, has become a popular attraction for people on art tours, averaging some 1,700 visitors a day.

Now a prominent artist who is known as a global nomad, Lee has had to endure a lonely struggle to pursue his art. "I was not the graduate of an art school, so I had nobody guiding and supporting me. I had to act aggressively to survive. Sometimes, I was accepted, but then criticized and excluded, as I stood out. I had to fight in order not to be excluded. Moreover, I was discriminated against as a Japanese in Korea and as a Korean in Japan. In Europe, I was discriminated against as an Asian, so I would be left off the list even though I had been recommended...I was always on the margins and alone. But I've never said to myself: 'I can't try any more because I'm discriminated against.' As soon as I say that, I would have to admit to being a loser."

OEUVRES / WORKS

Habiter le temps - Centre pompidou Metz 2019

Countering Frank Stella's celebrated formula and Minimalist slogan 'What you see is what you see', Lee Ufan favours an alternative: 'What you see is what you don't see'. As a painter, sculptor, poet, philosopher and creator of environments, Ufan's works function as revelatory devices, drawing our attention to empty space, the tension generated between untouched areas of canvas, the distance dividing two elements of a sculpture, the viewer's position, effects of light and shade: everything we fail to notice at first glance, but which is there nonetheless, playing its role in the making and impact of a work of art.

Born in Korea in 1936, when the country was under Japanese occupation, Lee Ufan received a traditional, Confucian education which was to profoundly affect his subsequent development as an artist. From the outset of his career in the 1960s, Ufan strove to achieve a balance between his Korean roots, his links to Japan where he studied and worked, and his growing attachment to the West (he exhibited at the Paris Biennale of 1971).

At the intersection of three cultures, Lee Ufan's work is universal and immediate in intent. Immediate in the sense that language is not a requirement: Ufan often describes how he made his first works while planning to study literature and philosophy in Japan, but failed to master the language. He opted for visual communication instead, by-passing both language and figurative representation, and using sensitive interventions to provoke 'encounters': the encounter between natural and industrial materials, for example, in his celebrated sculpture series Relatum. As part of Japan's Mono-ha ('School of Things') movement, he strove for a new definition of art, distanced from Western norms and codes.

Lee Ufan's works are conceived as living experiences, bridging the worlds of philosophy and the visual arts. His sculptures play on our notion of space, while his paintings interact with time. Ufan strives endlessly to master infinity and to 'inhabiting time.'

Ufan's works have a powerful, aphoristic quality – each is a disconcertingly simple, visual and physical translation of philosophical principles, far removed from any attempt at figuration. Reflecting his highly personal vision of contemporary art, the exhibition offers a meditative pathway through and around the artist's themes of choice – the relationship between things and their surrounding space, forms and voids, but also the dialogue between action and non-action.

The exhibition itinerary offers an insight into successive or parallel phases in Lee Ufan's career, through pivotal works and often little-known 'historical' pieces, some of which have been specially recreated (these include the first French showing of the paintings Landscape I, II and III, originally featured in the exhibition Contemporary Korean Painting at Tokyo's National Museum of Modern Art in 1968; and a new Installation of cotton and steel created for the Forum of the Centre Pompidou Metz.) The exhibition ends with a meditation room, echoing the meditation cell installed by Lee Ufan as the conclusion of the visitor itinerary at his personal museum in Naoshima, Japan – a space designed to allow visitors to prolong their visit through reflection and recollection. Complementing and expanding the visitor experience, composer Ryuichi Sakamoto has created a soundtrack that resonates with the essential materials, poetry and philosophy of Lee Ufan's work.

Lee Ufan lives and works chiefly in Paris and Kamakura, Japan. His work has been seen around the world, at institutions including the Hermitage National Museum in St Petersburg, the Guggenheim Museum in New York, the Jeu de Paume in Paris, the Palace of Versailles, the Kunstmuseum in Bonn, the Städel Museum in Frankfurt, and the National Museum of Contemporary Art In Seoul; and at events including the Biennales of Venice (2007, 2011), Gwangju, Korea (2000, 2006), Shanghai (2000), Sydney (1976), São Paulo (1973) and Paris (1971). In 2014 and 2017, his work featured at the Centre Pompidou Metz as part of the themed exhibitions Simple Shapes and Japanorama. New perspectives on contemporary art. Ryuichi Sakamoto appeared in concert at the Centre Pompidou Metz as part of the museum's 10 Evenings accompanying the Japan Season in 2017.

Lee Ufan will shortly open a new foundation in Arles, housed in the Hôtel Vernon, a seventeenth-century building located near the city's Roman arena, remodelled by the artist's friend, architect Tadao Ando.

'In the 1960s, I wanted to settle in the United States,' says Ufan, 'but in the 1970s I found myself in Paris, by chance, where my work and ideas were influenced by classical art, especially the collections at the Louvre. That was what persuaded me to settle in France.' Why Arles? 'I discovered the city thanks to the publisher Actes Sud, and the launch of a monograph of my work. This Roman city, rich in history, was a catalyst for new ideas and thinking,' he says. 'The Hôtel Vernon is very well located near the ancient arena, at the heart of the ruins of Roman civilisation. The building has been occupied by the same family for several generations: it gave me a strong sense of time. I was inspired by the [potential for] dialogue between my work and the city's fragmented ruins. I wasn't interested in a new building, at all.' Ufan notes what was, for him, a significant detail: 'the seventeenth-century guild carpenters had inscribed dates on the roof beams, thanks to which we know that the main, supporting beam was installed seven years before the death of Louis XIV.' And in 2014, Lee Ufan was the guest artist at Louis XIV's very own the park and palace, in Versailles.

« Le point, c'est exister. Le trait, c'est vivre »¹

Après son étonnant et vaste dialogue sculptural avec le château de Versailles et les jardins d'André Le Nôtre, en 2014, Lee Ufan expose, à Paris, ses peintures les plus récentes ainsi que onze aquarelles de 1983. La galerie kamel mennour est honorée de les présenter dans son nouvel espace de la rue Matignon et d'accrocher aux cimaises du site de la rue du Pont de Lodi des tableaux aux couleurs et vibratos inédits, signes d'une période nouvelle dans l'œuvre du peintre.

Lee Ufan est multiple. Peintre et sculpteur mondialement connu et reconnu, il est aussi écrivain, philosophe et critique d'art. Il est coréen et japonais, une double richesse culturelle étoffée par des relations privilégiées avec la France, l'Allemagne, le Danemark et bien d'autres régions du monde. Cette vie kaléidoscopique est lestée par un silence essentiel où le dessin et l'aquarelle prennent une part primordiale. « Mes pensées et mes actes ne cessent de voltiger à tout moment. Le dessin, c'est le premier contact entre le papier et moi et le développement de nos relations. On dit bien que le dessin est libre de projet, et de structure, et arbitraire, il est vraiment ce qui convient le mieux à l'activité du peintre », écrit-il dans son livre L'Art de la résonance.²

Qu'elle soit dessinée, peinte ou sculptée, chaque œuvre de Lee Ufan est un départ. Un point existentiel comme un événement à partir duquel se déploie l'exploration d'un monde infini — inconnu et pourtant vital. Cette aventure se fait en dialogue avec l'œuvre. Il s'agit d'atteindre le processus créatif qui ouvre l'art à sa vie propre. Il permettra au regardeur d'entrer dans une danse où se joue la partition du sentir. L'issue en est vitale : devenir plus libre, plus vaste, plus accordé à l'infini. Donc à l'univers. « Ce n'est pas l'univers qui est infini, c'est l'infini qui est l'univers », énonce Lee Ufan. La nuance est de la taille de l'illimité où chacun peut inventer de nouvelles dimensions de soi.³

Cela est d'abord vrai pour Lee Ufan lui-même. Il le souligne en marquant une différence entre peinture et sculpture. Cette dernière est, pour lui, en relation avec l'environnement où elle apparaît. C'est pourquoi les sculptures prennent toujours le titre-préfixe de Relatum auquel s'adjoint un titre-suffixe variable. En revanche, la création picturale, elle, est une pratique solitaire : « Je dois, pour ma peinture, me défier tout seul. L'événement qui se passe entre la toile et moi est proche d'un rite secret, complètement fermé à l'extérieur.⁴ » Dans ce hors temps méditatif, Lee Ufan cherche à être relié à l'inconnu, à percevoir « le monde indéterminé qui précède le langage »⁵. Ce lien présidera à l'élaboration entière d'une peinture ou d'un dessin. C'est la clé. Lee Ufan cherche à rejoindre cette dimension. Avant de peindre, il ajuste la respiration et le rythme du corps pour que l'énergie, s'animant d'une pulsion vitale, trouve son passage vers l'infini. Un déclic se produit. Il ouvre le lieu où peindre. Le tableau est alors comme un être vivant qui inaugure une résonance de l'espace. C'est là que le regardeur est invité à s'aventurer : vers l'inconnu. Car la pensée et la réalité ne sont pas en conformité l'une avec l'autre. La réalité est finie, la peinture infinie...

Lee Ufan a été l'initiateur et le théoricien du Mono-ha (l'École de la chose). Ce courant a regroupé de 1967 à 1970, au Japon, des artistes montrant l'art comme processus entre deux choses ou entre une chose et l'espace. Les artistes du Mono-ha, que l'on a parfois rapproché des minimalistes et des plasticiens de l'arte povera, étaient désireux d'arpenter les rapports avec l'extérieur, en établissant des relations spatiales. Cette relation entre intérieur, extérieur et espace marquent aujourd'hui encore l'œuvre de Lee Ufan.

À Naoshima, sur la petite île japonaise de la mer intérieure de Seto, le plasticien a créé, avec la complétude de son ami architecte Tadao Ando, un lieu de recueillement. Dédié au silence et à la méditation, il vibre de la rencontre entre vie et mort. Serait-ce une autre manière de désigner l'intérieur et l'extérieur ? En tout cas, pour Lee Ufan, une œuvre réussie parvient à tenir en elle la vie et la mort, parvient à dépasser le dilemme fondamental de la condition humaine. Le dessin et la peinture sont de ce fait les outils privilégiés de la métaphysique.
